

Bye-Bye Frosé: Bartenders Weigh In On The 2018 Drinks Of Summer

OLIVIA HARRISON
JUNE 12, 2018, 12:20 PM

For the past several summers, frosé has been the drink on everyone's lips. Restaurants and bars across the country have their own takes on the frozen rosé drink, from simple strawberry or lemon juice-infused versions to the most over-the-top interpretation piled high with candy, and everything in between. Well, no offense to frosé, but the magic has started to wane. It was bound to happen with time. This summer, we're looking for a new drink trend, something that will make us feel the way we did the very first time we slurped down frosé — a cocktail that's as refreshing, delicious, and yes, Instagram-worthy as the icy-cold, pink favorite of summers past.

As part of our quest, we reached out to bartenders across the country for their insights into what drinks former frosé lovers will be obsessing over in the coming months. Ahead, find all the warm-weather beverage trends they've been noticing, including frozen cocktails, spritzes, and something called a "schappsicle."

Move over frosé, summer 2018 has some

Daniela Mastropietro, bartender at Sauce Restaurant in New York, NY Sgroppino

"This summer, I think the Sgroppino is going to be very popular. It's a classic Italian summer drink that combines lemon sorbet, vodka, prosecco, and limoncello and is perfect for enjoying on a patio in the sun. Sauce Restaurant offers this cocktail as a rotating special."

